Social Care and Neurodisability

A journal on practice, management, research and law

This Journal is a single source of practice and research for those working with people with neurological conditions. The content provides crucial knowledge at a time when the provision of social care is undergoing radical change, with the introduction of the personalisation agenda and increase in litigation leading to an expansion in independent case management.

The Journal provides a medium for the sharing of information on good practice and advances in the rehabilitation, treatment and care of people who have neurological conditions.

Vital information for: anyone working in social work, case management, social care, NHS and primary care trusts, and all others interested in neurodisability and neuroscience, including practitioners, managers, academics, social workers, case managers and care workers, ABI co-ordinators and allied health professionals.

Journal of Integrated Care
Practical evidence for service improvement

This Journal facilitates the evidence-based integration of health, social care and other community services in order to benefit service users and patients, and transcend traditional service and professional boundaries.

Journal of Integrated Care offers you the latest national policy and law, and actively promotes user and carer engagement. Regular topics include: getting evidence into practice; evaluation of effectiveness and outcomes; local case studies; adult and children's services and their interface; allied health professionals, social work and social care; and has a regular legal column.

Frequency: six issues a year
